WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

VERY HOT Today/Wed, near to record breaking heat

High Risk of Significant Fire Potential when thunderstorm activity increases later this week, continues into the weekend

Very strong high pressure over Northern California will hold us in its grip for several days yet. The peak of the heat today and Wednesday will bring 110 to around 115 to the hottest inland areas. Firefighter health is of serious concern in this heatwave -- staying cool will be just as important as good hydration. Thunderstorm activity will be very limited again today through Thursday, but can't be ruled out entirely along and near the Cascade/Sierra crest today, the same area plus the NW mountains Wednesday and then perhaps be most likely over our western mountains Thursday.

A SE flow with monsoon moisture in it will be across Northern California later Wednesday and Thursday. The weather pattern will change a little Friday as a small trough arrives along the coast and turns the flow more southerly, but that will still bring monsoon moisture northward. The trough will move inland over the weekend but continue to draw moisture into it, so the chance of thunderstorms will continue with nocturnal storms possible. High Risk designation for Significant Fires is in place for a few of the western mountain areas Thursday, then for more of our mountain areas Friday and Saturday. These conditions may need to be extended into early next week, but there remains a great deal of uncertainty about that, so no High Risk designations have been extended that far out as of yet. Given our fuel conditions, any thunderstorms will favor new starts, possibly create holdovers and support active burning or even rapid fire spread.

The coastal marine layer is thinner but hanging in there with areas of overnight and morning low clouds. Cooler temperatures will be over the region after Wednesday, but afternoon highs will remain at least a bit above normal and in the triple digits for our warmer inland areas through early next week. Winds will generally remain light through the end of the week with daily afternoon sea breezes near the coast and some locally gusty afternoon winds in the valleys.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Scattered showers and wet thunderstorms this week

Well above normal temperatures next several days

Monsoonal moisture will overspread the area during the next few days, leading to scattered showers and wet thunderstorms. Early this morning, the bulk of the precipitation was occurring from Los Angeles County south and eastward. These showers should slowly decrease through the morning, but further shower and thunderstorm activity is expected this afternoon. Most of the precipitation today will occur in the Sierras, deserts, and across the coastal areas from Ventura County southward. Wednesday and Thursday, the moisture will expand further north and west and nearly the entire forecast area outside the central coast may see some precipitation. Temperatures will be hottest across Central CA today where sunshine will allow temperatures to climb to 105-108 in the interior valleys. Southern CA will likely be a bit cooler today and Wednesday due to cloud cover, but in general, expect highs to remain around 10 degrees above normal. Northwest winds of 10-20 mph will develop each afternoon along the central coast. In addition, north winds of 10-20 with higher gusts may occur over Santa Barbara County tonight and again Wednesday night. The moisture will slowly exit the area this weekend, and by Sunday and Monday, only isolated convection is expected in the desert with the rest of the district turning sunny with temperatures remaining in the upper 90s in the valleys and lower foothills
